We need a plan. Sexual assault on campus is a national issue

A FIVE DAY METRO SPECIAL FOCUS metroNEWS

ROSEMARY WESTWOOD

Investigating the vacuum of accountability

Canada: the country without a plan.

On every campus, in every province and territory, students — and women in particular — face sexual violence and harassment. It devastates minds and bodies and thwarts academic dreams.

And yet: No one is seeking a national solution for this national problem.

As a result, we have had to non-existent policies and bad to non-existent data. Universities, which have an abysmal track record for responding to and preventing sexual assault, have been given autonomy to fix the problem.

It's bad for the country and dangerous for staff and students.

All week, Metro investigates this vacuum of national accountability. And we begin today, with the story of five women who pose the greatest threat yet to the status quo.

Conscientious housing

Meet the apartment building for people with mental disabilities that has an environmental conscience. It's expected that the 42-unit apartment building opening this week will be North America's first affordable housing complex to be certified as a passive house.

Emma Jackson
Metro | Ottawa

How would you like to pay $28 to heat your apartment — for the entire year?

That's exactly what Ottawa Salus hopes to offer when it opens its new 42-unit affordable housing building this week.

The four-storey supportive housing complex on Clementine Boulevard near Billings Bridge will serve adults with severe mental illness, but it's also designed to support ambitious environmental and cost-saving goals through a passive house design never before used for affordable housing apartments in North America, according to executive director Lisa Ker.

Using things like thick insulation, tightly sealed doors and windows and a special energy recovery ventilator that circulates fresh air into the building, the apartments will likely be up to 90 per cent more efficient than regular buildings.

$28 a year

Yes, really. That's what it's expected to cost to heat an apartment at this new supportive housing complex.

"We're hoping to take the energy bills from this building after a year and compare them to a single family dwelling in the neighbourhood, and we hope they should be the same," said Ker.

That's not just an environmental gain — it could save up to 90 per cent of utility costs for the charitable organization, too, she said. The savings will help them maintain their other 13 supportive housing buildings around the city.

As a tax-funded building, that's a major push to be passive.

"It's imperative we manage the asset on behalf of the public ... and that we always seek to keep those costs at a reasonable level," Ker said.

Passive house certification is a long and stringent process, one the apartment building has yet to finalize. Ker expects the certification to come this fall.

But Ker said the 42 new residents will be at the forefront of a shift to sustainable building — despite being some of the most vulnerable in the community.

"That's a powerful message," she said. "People who we consider to be the poorest, still they would be considered to be championing an approach that is good for all Canadians. And I love that we can be part of that."

Lisa Ker, executive director of Ottawa Salus, expects tenants to move into the charity's latest supportive housing complex next weekend. EMMA JACKSON/METRO

How it's done

- 1 Visionary: Lisa Ker, executive director of Ottawa Salus Corporation, says the 42-unit building will be the first passive-certified affordable housing building in North America.
- 2 Windows: The building's European windows and doors are passive house certified, meaning they're triple glazed and sealed tightly against heat loss. The windows are nearly three times more efficient than the Ontario building code requires, and the doors are two times more efficient.
- 3 Walls: The apartment's exterior walls are padded with 13 inches of insulation layered in a sandwich of insulation panels, graphite-based Neopor insulation and special tape to seal joints, to make them 2.3 times more efficient than the building code's rules.
- 4 Roof: The building's roof is painted white to reflect heat in the summer and — hopefully — make the building's backup cooling system redundant. It's also 1.5 times more efficient than the building code requires.
- 5 Airflow: A massive centralized energy recovery ventilation unit is located in the basement to circulate fresh air throughout the building. Fresh air is pumped in — and old air is pushed out — once every three hours.

Lawyers offer services for free

PRO BONO

About 4,000 donated time to help 20,000 Ontarians

Adam Kveton
For Metro | Ottawa

So, a lawyer walks into a bar ...

You can fill in the rest. Everyone's got their own ending to that joke, but you can bet, more often than not, the lawyer doesn't come off looking too great. But we've got a stat that might surprise you.

Just last year, 4,000 lawyers donated their time to help 20,000 people in Ontario who were representing themselves in court, said David Scott, a lawyer from Ottawa with 55 years of experience.

And there are many more lawyers waiting in the wings to do their part for people who just don't have the cash to pay for a lawyer, he said.

Scott is one of many volunteers with Pro Bono Ontario, an organization that seeks to give legal help to those who can't afford it.

They run the Law Help Ontario Centre located in the Ottawa courthouse, as well as a legal aid office at CHEO.

Pro Bono Ontario held its sixth national pro bono conference in Ottawa this past week, so Metro thought it would be a prime time to find out how one goes about getting a free lawyer.

From speaking with Scott, as well as the executive director for Pro Bono Ontario, Lynn Burns, we found there are a couple of requirements.

The first is need. The Law Help centre provides legal advice based on how much money the person who needs help makes in a year.

For an individual, they have to make under $36,000, said Burns. For a family of four, it's under $76,000.

Also, the Law Help Centre only provides advice from lawyers to individuals representing themselves in court.

Though in some cases the centre can arrange for a lawyer to represent you in court, or in another capacity, said Scott.

The rules surrounding how much you make a year can also get more flexible when it comes to medical issues. Pro Bono Ontario has a centre in CHEO specifically to help families struggling with medical costs, lost income and other things, said Burns.

Another way to get a free lawyer is to just have a really interesting case.

That's something outside of the Pro Bono Ontario program, but Scott has agreed to take on free work on that basis plenty of times, he said.

"That's how you get started in this business, you know. If you don't take the interesting cases, you may wait a long time for anything."

But he's also taken on cases because he feels the individual is deserving.

He remembers one case where a woman who, with her family, had arrived recently in Canada and had lost her job at a fast-food restaurant because she'd taken a few sick days. Finding she had been fired, she applied for unemployment insurance, but found her employer had reported that she quit.

"So here is this family with virtually no income and running up against bureaucracy," said Scott. "And without a lawyer, they'd have been cooked ... so I just picked up the phone."

Pro Bono Ontario seeks to give legal help to those who can't afford it. CONTRIBUTED

One hour and one meeting later, the whole thing was.

"Can you imagine that little family, new Canadians, trying to resolve that on their own?" said Scott. "It would be hopeless."

Steps to getting a pro bono lawyer

1— You have a legal issue that a lawyer could help you with, but you don't want or can't pay.

2— Is your issue related to criminal or family law? If so, the government funds legal aid plans that can help you.

3— If not, go see the Law Help Centre at the Ottawa Courthouse. Or, if your legal issue is related to childcare medical costs, see their office at CHEO.

4— Be willing to represent yourself. The Law Help Centre's volunteer lawyers will give you legal advice provided your income is under a certain threshold. For an individual, that's under $36,000 a year.

5— In some cases, lawyers will agree to represent you in court if you have a dire need, or if they find your case particularly interesting. Then, even if you can pay, they might agree to represent you.

Residents along Emond Street are tired of speeding and criminal activity taking place on what they feel is a great little Vanier street. MICHELLE NASH BAKER/METROLAND MEDIA

Close our street, say residents

VANIER
Frustration about crime and speeding

Michelle Nash Baker
Metroland Media

It's been a rough summer for residents living on Emond Street in Vanier.

Emond has the benefit of a strip club at one end and a children's park at the other. Mixed in are homes.

In the spring, residents met with Rideau-Vanier Coun. Mathieu Fleury to discuss their desire to close off the street to Montreal Road traffic.

They feel the idea is simple — close the street just after the businesses and issues would stop: johns circling, speeding, crime and disorderly patrons from area businesses.

"A street closure has been shown to eliminate these types of issues," said long-time resident Kathryn Greer-Close.

Fleury recently hosted a meeting to address the frustrations. He invited residents, the owners of the Playmate strip club, Stephane Godard of the Alcohol and Gaming Commission of Ontario, and community police officer Jonathan Kenney.

Playmate owner Patrick Campeau said he is open to listening to residents' concerns and their ideas to fix the problem.

For Greer-Close, the only answer is a road closure. She cited studies showing crime can be reduced by the simple and cheap insertion of posts and a chain between residences and businesses, to block through traffic.

Campeau said if there are studies and this is what would improve the quality of life of the neighbours, he would support it.

Fleury committed to seeking a temporary closure.

The idea to close the road is not a new one. The old city of Vanier's secondary plan suggested the closure of side streets Emond, Olmstead, Cyr and Dupuis streets. Dupuis was the first street the old city of Vanier closed.

Montreal Road is scheduled for renewal in 2018.

2016 is worst year for gun violence

Emma Jackson
Metro | Ottawa

A 27-year-old was taken to hospital in critical condition early Sunday morning after the city's 50th shooting of the year.

Ottawa police said shots were fired near the corner of Byward and George streets around 3 a.m.

The incident breaks the city's annual record for shootings with three months still to go in 2016. Until now, 2014 had been the capital's worst year for gun violence, with 49 shootings that year.

It's also been a particularly deadly year so far, with 13 homicides under investigation. There were seven murders in Ottawa last year.

Police said the latest shooting is under investigation and no one is in custody at this time..

ALTA VISTA

Residents oppose apartment complex

Erin McCracken
Metroland Media

Voices of worry and opposition drowned out a modicum of support for plans to construct 340 rental apartment units in Herongate.

Crime, privacy, parking, traffic, garbage, affordability, retail and tenant mix and building heights were among the worries raised over Timbercreek Management's proposal to build a sixstorey, three-building complex at the corner of Heron Road and Sandalwood Drive.

The project is not compatible with the character of Alta Vista, largely comprised of single-family homes, said Dirk de Vos, who attended a recent public meeting.

But Greg Rogers, senior vice-president of Timbercreek Management, said the company's vision is "to build an alignment" between Alta Vista and the new Herongate apartments.

Retail space at the corner of one of the apartment buildings at Heron Road and Sandalwood Drive could become home to a coffee shop, convenience store or even a yoga study.

"It's an opportunity for people to sit and enjoy — not a place to hang out and do bad things," Rogers said.

There were also worries over who will move into the apartments, and what measures will be implemented to prevent crime and loitering.

Rogers said the short answer to those concerns is price. Rents will reflect the "premium nature of the community," and the pet-friendly units are expected to draw young professionals, young families and people who are downsizing. The property will house about 600 people.

If Timbercreek secures city approvals — the company is now at the site plan control application stage — construction could begin by the end of this year. A completion date is targeted for spring of 2018, said Rogers.

Sexual Assault on Campus: A Metro Special Focus

From left: Paniz Khosroshahy of McGill University in Montreal, Ellie Ade Kur of the University of Toronto, Glynnis Kirchmeier, alumna of UBC, Tarrah McPherson of Mount St. Vincent University in Halifax, Mandi Gray of York University in Toronto. CALVIN SIT/FOR METRO, EDUARDO LIMA/METRO, DAVID RYDER/FOR METRO, JEFF HARPER/METRO

You don't know these women, but you should. They're members of the most important and organized national effort to fight campus sexual assault. Metro's Rosemary Westwood tells their stories.

The improbable five

Rosemary Westwood
Metro | Toronto

To the casual eye, there was nothing intimidating about them.

The five women, dressed for a midsummer heat wave in tank tops, dresses and short shorts, sat behind fold-out tables and passed around a single mike on a too-short cord.

It could have been any panel discussion, on any topic, on any campus across the country. The room at Ryerson University in Toronto bland and grey. The women, for the most part, were novice public speakers.

But the room was nonetheless gripped. And so, too, should be every university president in Canada.

These five women drawn from across the country, this somewhat unwilling motley crew of survivors and witnesses shut out from justice, this ragtag power group thrust together by rape and assault in a space they thought would be safe.

These are the five unlikely women taking on a $40-billion university sector and demanding an end to the ineffective and alienating treatment of sexual-assault victims on campuses — the women who actually stand a chance of winning.

The most nationally known might be Mandi Gray, 28, a PhD student in sociology at York University in Toronto, whose rapist was recently sentenced to 18 months in jail (a conviction he's appealed). She spoke first, in a blend of shy body language and blunt words.

Then there's Paniz Khosroshahy, 20, a swift, staccato-talking third-year women's-studies major at McGill University in Montreal, prone to long tangents.

The poised and eloquent Ellie Ade Kur, 24, a PhD student in geography at the University of Toronto, preferred to stand up and pace, commanding the room like a Ted Talk regular.

There was Glynnis Kirchmeier, 28, a sharp, pragmatic alumna of the University of British Columbia, now skilled at navigating university bureaucracy.

And finally, Tarrah McPherson, 38, a former student at Mount Saint Vincent University in Halifax, a mother of two and the most reluctant public figure of the five.

They had organized this event themselves, in early August, calling it "What are Canadian Universities Actually Doing about Sexual Assault?: A nation-wide panel discussion."

About 50 people, mostly women in their early 20s, filled a few rows of plastic chairs. It was the culmination of a week-long make-shift conference, where the women and some of their lawyers shared stories, traded legal tactics and began plans for a new, national hub of activism.

The panellists had been drawn to one another over the past few years as their requests on their schools' largely curtailed bureaucratic processes.

And, most significantly, three women have filed human-rights complaints against their schools that could change the legal landscape for sexual assault in the country.

Previous known human-rights complaints dealing with campus sexual assault and harassment have argued that the assaults themselves were infringements on human rights.

But McPherson, Kirchmeier and Gray are each alleging that their schools

We're drawing linkages between these cases to demonstrate ... there needs to be oversight.

Mandi Gray

stories hit the news: four women who complained to their school of sexual assault and found their schools wanting; and one woman who witnessed sexual harassment and became an outspoken activist against her school's response. Like a growing number of women across the country, they each chose to go public with their experiences.

But then they went even further.

Some started anti-sexual-assault organizations on their campuses. Some filed freedom-of-information requests directly discriminate against women through their sexual-assault practices, policies and protocols — that the very systems supposedly designed to support victims are violating victims' human rights.

It's a unique legal tactic with no known precursor. And if any one of them is successful, it could set a new high bar for how universities handle sexual assault.

But the complaints represent an even more direct threat to the status quo. They set out clear templates that women and assault vic-

IN-DEPTH | HUMAN-RIGHTS COMPLAINTS

Three of the five women in this story have made human-rights complaints central to advocacy.

What are they?

By law, every Canadian has the right to personal security and freedom from discrimination. Anyone who believes their rights have been violated — by their employer, say, or school — can file a complaint with a federal or provincial agency.

How do they work?

If the agency accepts the complaint, there may be attempted mediation or early settlement. If unsuccessful, the matter moves to a court-like tribunal.

What do they accomplish?

Tribunals can set penalties and monetary damages. The decisions also serve as precedents.

tims could copy, at any university, in any province or territory. Their three cases could be just the beginning.

Gray's case was the first, filed with the Ontario Human Rights Tribunal in June of 2015. It was the culmination of what she described as a "very long battle" with York University after she was raped by a fellow PhD student that January.

"I just wanted to return to campus without having to run into him," Gray told me. But that proved challenging. Gray's complaint alleges, among other things, a failure of school policies, a lack of any centralized place to report and get information, a lack of adequately trained staff and a requirement to enter a school-administered tribunal process without her consent.

In essence, she says, the school discriminates against women — overwhelmingly the main targets of sexual violence — in its approach to redressing sexual-assault complaints.

In response, York has defended its support for sexual-assault survivors, including counselling, emergency financial support and housing. It's also in the midst of developing a distinct sexual-assault policy to comply with Ontario's new Bill 132.

But Joanna Birenbaum, Gray's lawyer, told Metro that her client's human-rights complaint demands much more from schools' sexual-assault policies than the new legislation requires.

"Women bear the brunt of this policy failure, some-

Join The Fight

Canada needs a national plan for campus sexual assault. Tell your story and pressure your MP using #safercampusnow times at the cost of their education and careers,” Birenbaum said.

Meanwhile, in Halifax, Tarrah McPherson had been facing similar institutional challenges at Mount Saint Vincent University, after claiming sexual harassment by a professor. She alleges the school dissuaded her from filing a formal complaint, that support and advice was delayed, and the school did little to help her as she struggled academically. MSVU didn’t have a separate sexual-assault policy at the time of her complaint; it has since created one.

“I didn’t even know (a human-rights complaint) was an option for me,” she said, until she did some research. In looking for precedents, she discovered Gray’s case. Months later, in October 2015, McPherson’s complaint was accepted by the Nova Scotia Human Rights Commission. Part of her claim asks for the school to improve its sexual-assault policies.

When Glynnis Kirchmeier, the UBC alumna, heard about Gray’s case, it gave her a few ideas. Unlike Gray, she had not experienced sexual violence. But she had played a critical and visible role in excoriating UBC for sexual-assault policies that impacted her fellow students. She filed a freedom-of-information request first, looking for details on UBC’s policies and privacy rules. It was a strategic move: “I wanted to get them before they knew how serious of an enemy I was,” she said.

Then she hired Clea Parfitt, a lawyer with experience litigating against universities. Together, they wrote the complaint as a kind of road map, a detailed account of all the support and process that both lawyer and client believe a campus should have so as not to discriminate against women. Kirchmeier’s complaint — filed in March 2016 to the B.C. Human Rights Tribunal — is also different in its third-party status. Sexual-assault survivors will testify as witnesses, if necessary, but the mere fact of the complaint means it’s possible for anyone in B.C. to challenge a university’s sexual-assault protocols, whether or not they’ve used them.

* * *

For all three complaints, this fall will be pivotal. On Oct. 24, Kirchmeier’s case will enter mediation in B.C., where lawyers, UBC administrators and Kirch-

I wanted to get them before they knew how serious of an enemy I was.

meier will sit down to figure out if a deal can be struck, without further litigation. (UBC wouldn’t comment on specifics, beyond its participation in the process.) If that fails, the next step is to schedule a hearing.

Sometime in November, Gray’s case is expected to enter a similar process.

Nova Scotia’s Human Rights Commission is investigating McPherson’s case, and the decision about whether to move it forward to a board of inquiry is expected in the coming months. (Mount Saint Vincent University did not comment on the case, but will “comply fully with any investigative process.”)

But the larger political project, as Gray describes it, lies in this new national network the women are forming: “We’re drawing the linkages between these cases to demonstrate this is, in fact, a systemic-level issue, and there needs to be some kind of oversight, an external body to hold these universities accountable.”

When Paniz Khosroshahy was raped by a fellow McGill University student in Sept. 2014, she felt the lack of just such a group.

“I had no idea what was going on in other schools, because there’s no centralized group that’s sharing all this information,” she said. “That’s one of the problems we want to hopefully address, getting more funding and making it more visible and centralized and sharing what’s happening.” She envisions a website that shares stories and educates students on the laws in their provinces.

For Ellie Ade Kur, who was sexually assaulted while an undergraduate at the University of Toronto, this kind of grassroots community organizing holds the best hope — far more than any revised policies or legislation — of giving sexual-assault survivors the support they need.

And, if necessary, the legal tactics.

Already, other women connected to the group are considering human-rights cases of their own.

At that first national meeting, that hot summer evening, few of the women had kind words to say about consent education, the posters and buttons and campaigns that swept across university campuses last month.

Gray has dubbed it “the fetishization of consent education,” an easy PR tactic that is far less expensive and time consuming than creating a comprehensive response to sexual assault.

“My attacker knew what consent was,” Gray said, as the panel was winding down.

“I don’t need a hashtag,” Ade Kur said. “I need help.”

About the series

Mon. | The power of five
The most organized and important Canada-wide effort to combat campus sexual assault comes not from the RCMP or Justice Department but from an unlikely crew of five normal young women from across the country.

Tues. | A federal vacuum
The problem is national, but solutions have been regional and parochial.

Wed. | The U.S. & U.K.
The U.S.’s federal anti-discrimination laws and directives from the White House combine to create more rigorous requirements for American post-secondary schools to protect students.

Thurs. | Dearth of data
There is no national database on campus sexual violence. We don’t know how big the problem is because no one is incentivized to find out.

Fri. | The way ahead
We have a problem; we need a plan.

The plan

Mandi, Tarrah, Glynnis, Ellie and Paniz have only met once face-to-face. But from separate parts of the country, they’re co-ordinating a national movement.

1. Going public. All five are putting their names and reputations on the line, speaking to media to grow awareness.

2. Telling their stories. Khosroshahy has written columns about her assault. Gray blogs and is making a documentary.

5. Human-rights claims.

By arguing policies infringe rights on the basis of gender, the women give a road map to advocates.

4. National organization. They envision an online portal with legal info, survivor resources, advocacy.

3. FOIA requests. Using access-to-information laws, the women have requested their policies and correspondence.

We are hiring for 75 warehouse positions in the West End starting in October. Full-time hours for a seasonal shipping period until early January. Monday to Friday with overtime with a pay rate of $11.40/hr plus 4% vacation pay.

New threat on the streets

HEALTH

Officials fear dangerous W-18 drug may take fentanyl's place

As Canada struggles with a deadly epidemic linked to the powerful painkiller fentanyl, a new and potentially more lethal threat is already emerging.

Invented in a University of Alberta laboratory in 1981, the drug known as W-18 was designed as a non-addictive painkiller. It was patented but never developed by pharmaceutical companies for public use, yet someone is manufacturing it.

When the drug was patented, testing on mice showed it was 10,000 times more powerful than morphine, according to Health Canada.

"This suggests a potentially severe risk for harm to individuals," the agency warned this summer in passing regulations that will soon make W-18 a Schedule 1 drug under the Controlled Drug and Substances Act, along with the likes of heroin and cocaine.

W-18 was designed as a non-addictive painkiller. It was never developed for public use, yet someone is manufacturing it. CONTRIBUTED Health Canada noted there was "limited scientific information" available about the drug though more testing is underway.

Despite the risks, W-18 is showing up with more frequency in police drug hauls, according to Health Canada figures.

In 2015, there were just three drug seizures by Canadian police that tested positive for W-18 at Health Canada laboratories.

So far in 2016 there have been more than 30 positive tests — for an average of more than three times a month, according to Health Canada. Fifteen cases occurred in British Columbia and 14 in Alberta.

But the drug has also started showing up in Ontario, where W-18 has been detected on two occasions so far this year. Both cases involved drug seizures made by the Greater Sudbury Police.

One resulted in three men — from Sudbury, Toronto and Manitoulin Island — being arrested May 12, according to a spokesperson for the force.

The emergence of W-18 and other obscure synthetic drugs is due to the squeeze by law enforcement on more prominent or easily accessible drugs, police say.

An RCMP intelligence report published this month attributed the rise in fentanyl use, and the record number of deaths and overdoses, to the removal of the painkiller OxyContin from the market in 2012.

As law enforcement now clamps down on fentanyl production, W-18 is considered to be "at the high end of the threat spectrum" to take its place, the report said.

British Columbia has declared a health emergency over the fentanyl crisis, and there is pressure to do the same in Alberta. The Quebec government has been asked to better control prescriptions of opioid painkillers for fear of being swept up in the deadly drug wave.

This summer, Ontario became the first province to stop paying for high doses of morphine and fentanyl in a bid to prevent addiction and overdoses. But the Ontario Association of Chiefs of Police warned a few weeks ago that the province is already facing a "chronic opioid crisis."

Indigenous court first for Canada

The Mohawk band council of Akwesasne has introduced what is considered the first indigenous legal system in Canada outside a federal framework.

While First Nations band councils have been passing and enforcing legislation on reserves across the country for decades, those by-laws are either tied to the Indian Act or within a self-governance agreement with the federal government. What's special about the new court law passed by the council of Akwesasne is that it was drafted by the community.

"It's a historical moment. It's the first in Canada," said Joyce King, director of justice in Akwesasne.

Justices and prosecutors must enforce 32 laws that cover civil matters including tobacco regulations, sanitation, elections, property and wildlife conservation. Criminal matters are still settled outside the territory, in federal or provincial courts.

Akwesasne's council decided to mix aspects of Canada's justice system with Mohawk values, such as considering the talents of the offending party and using them to benefit the community.

Military calls on Aleppo rebels to surrender

Syrian rebels and pro-government forces clashed Sunday on several fronts around Aleppo as the country's military command called on militants to lay down their weapons and evacuate the contested city.

A day after pro-government forces captured the strategic al-Shuqef hill north of the city, the Britain-based Syrian Observatory for Human Rights monitoring group reported fierce fighting in areas near the hill and in the Bustan al-Basha neighbourhood.

The two sides also clashed in Aleppo's southern Sheikh Saeed neighbourhood.

The government's attempt to penetrate Aleppo's opposition-held eastern side has been accompanied by a relentless campaign of airstrikes by Russian and Syrian warplanes.

President Bashar Assad's forces are depending on the Russia bombardment and Iran-backed militias for support.

A spokesman for the Nour el-Din el-Zinki rebel faction told The Associated Press that foreign fighters were actively participating in the government's ground campaign. He said rebels could identify Lebanese and Iraqi militias by their flags.

An airstrike, meanwhile, targeted a rebel headquarter near the central city of Hama, killing at least six militants, the Observatory said.

The UN's humanitarian chief, Stephen O'Brien, reported that eastern Aleppo's health system has been "all but obliterated" by shelling and bombardment.

"Medical facilities are being hit one by one," O'Brien said in a statement that called for a 48-hour humanitarian pause to the fighting each week. The UN estimates 275,000 people are trapped by the government siege.

The U.N. says at least 320 civilians have been killed since the government announced its offensive Sept. 22.

In a statement, EU foreign policy chief Frederica Mogherini urged international players to unite to make the aid effort work "for the sake of humanity and the political future of Syria."

EGYPT

Lawmaker's call for virginity tests draws ire

A women's rights group has filed a legal complaint against an Egyptian lawmaker who called for mandatory virginity tests for women seeking university admission, the Al-Masry Al-Youm newspaper reported Sunday.

It quoted Maya Morsi, head of the state-sanctioned National Council for Women, as saying the complaint demands the expulsion from parliament of Ilhami Agha and a criminal investigation into his actions. She said the lawmaker was harming the reputation of Egyptian women, men and the country itself.

Agha said in an interview last week that virginity tests were needed to combat the proliferation of informal marriages, known as "gawaz orfy," between students. Virtually expense free, such marriages have become more popular in recent years because of high youth unemployment and a shortage of affordable housing.

The gawaz orfy is widely viewed as a religiously sanctioned way of having premarital sex, a taboo in mostly conservative and majority Muslim Egypt. Muslim clerics have spoken out against such marriages.

In Egypt, as in other conservative, Muslim countries, a young woman's virginity is widely seen as a matter of family honour, the loss of which could prevent her from getting married. THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Colombia peace deal threatened after referendum

Colombia's peace deal with leftist rebels seemed headed to defeat as votes against the accord held a razor-thin edge in a national referendum Sunday, less than a week after it was signed in front of an audience of heads of states.

With more than 99 per cent of polling stations reporting, 50.2 per cent of ballots opposed the accord with the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia while just 49.8 per cent favoured it — a difference of less than 60,000 votes out of a total of 13 million.

Clinton addresses gun issues

U.S. POLITICS

Presidential hopeful's focus on protecting America's kids

Hillary Clinton said Sunday that the spate of gun violence in the United States should call the nation to do more to protect "all of God's children."

Clinton addressed congregants at Little Rock AME Zion Church in Charlotte, N.C., fewer than two weeks after the shooting death of Keith Lamont Scott touched off two nights of violent protests in the city's downtown.

"Protecting all of God's children is America's calling," the Democratic presidential nominee said. Clinton said too many black families have been forced to deal with the same tragedy as Scott's family.

"Our entire country should take a moment to really look at what's going on here and across America, to imagine what we see on the news and what we hear about, imagine it through our children's eyes," she said.

Clinton had planned to visit the city last week but delayed the trip after city officials said their resources were stretched thin. North Carolina is among the nation's top battleground states and Clinton's campaign has invested heavily in the state won by Republican Mitt Romney in the 2012 election.

Clinton did not mention Republican Donald Trump by name but referenced her opponent's calls for "law-and-order" during the campaign. "There are some out there who see this as a moment to fan the flames of resentment and division. Who want to exploit people's fears even though it means tearing our nation even further apart," Clinton said. "They say that all of our problems would be solved simply by more law and order. As if the systemic racism plaguing our country doesn't exist."

The former secretary of state has made gun control and criminal justice reform a centerpiece of her campaign, speaking after high-profile shootings in Texas, Louisiana and South Carolina. She pointed to the shootings of police officers in Dallas; Baton Rouge, Louisiana; and Philadelphia; and said their families deserved prayers.

"It's been a hard year, hasn't it?" Clinton asked, as people in the congregation answered "Yes."

"Think about how many times President Obama has had to console our nation about another senseless tragedy, another shattered family, another distressed community and our children are watching and they feel it, too."

During the services, Clinton invited 9-year-old Zianna Oliphant to join her at the pulpit, recalling the black child's tearful address to the city council on race relations. Clinton acknowledged the gap in how white and black children are treated. She said that while she worries about her two grandchildren, her worries "are not the same as black grandmothers" noting her daughter's children are related to a former president and secretary of state. Hurricane closes in on Haiti

A powerful Hurricane Matthew moved slowly Sunday across the Caribbean Sea on a track that authorities warned could trigger devastation in parts of Haiti.

The storm had winds of 145 mph (230 km/h) as it moved northwest and the centre was expected to pass across or very close to the southwestern tip of Haiti late Monday before reaching Cuba, according to the U.S. National Hurricane Center in Miami. A hurricane warning was in effect for Jamaica, Cuba and Haiti. Forecasters said the southern Haitian countryside around Les Cayes could see the worst of it.

"Wherever that centre passes close to would see the worst winds and that's what's projected to happen for the western tip of Haiti," said John Cangilosi, a hurricane specialist at the centre. Matthew is one of the most powerful Atlantic hurricanes in recent history and briefly reached the top classification, Category 5, becoming the strongest hurricane here since Felix in 2007. THE QUESTION How do I make my married friend stop asking me whether I'm seeing anyone?

Dear Ellen,

I was out with a friend who is married. I really like her, and even though we only see each other a few times a year, we always have lots to talk about, except that she always asks if I'm seeing anyone, which makes me feel bad. I feel like she is judging me, or like I'm disappointing her. But I'm afraid to say anything in case I sound defensive. How do I politely get her to stop asking me this question all the time?

Signed,
Single Lady

Dear Single,

A good marriage is a blessing. Who wouldn't want to go through life shoulder to shoulder with a trusted ally whose love and support heightens every joy and softens every blow? Many single people desperately yearn to have this someday. As do many married people.

I'm always suspicious when marrieds persistently check up on everyone else's relationship status — the phrase "misery loves company" springs to mind. In my experience, people who are happily married don't care whether anyone else is or not. They don't need to constantly monitor your progress, or lack thereof, toward coupledness in order to feel better about their own coupled-unto-death existence.

Whatever their motivation, you have every right to feel affronted, because it's rude. Even in the olden days, when marriage was mindlessly accepted as the only acceptable outcome, asking whether you're paired with anyone would have been inappropriate. Nowadays, with marriage reduced to a half-normal proposition, it's even more presumptuous and inappropriate.

Some people ask out of crass ignorance. They don't realize that wanting to know if you're "seeing someone" is basically asking, "Ya gettin' any?" One way to handle this is to answer, "No, not at the moment, but since we're on the subject, what about you? Are you and your partner having sex these days? I hear a lot of married people get bored with their sex lives, and I guess having children really kills it." If they take offence at this, simply tell them: "Gosh, I'm so sorry, but I'm only asking because I care about you and I want you to be as happy as I am with my insanely good, unmarried sex life!"

Worse than crass, but more to be pitied, are the unhappily married people who ask out of a subconscious need to be validated. These are the people who go through life doubting their own choices, while fearing and despising anyone who makes different choices (and being single is just as much a choice as getting or staying married; anyone with a pulse and Internet access can be in a relationship if they really want to be).

In other words, if you feel your friend is "judging" you, or that your single state is "disappointing" her, you're probably right. Chances are, she needs everyone to be — or at least want to be — married like her. You could broach it with her if you want a deeper, more honest relationship. Otherwise, let her have it. For her, pretending it's better, or luckier, or smarter to be married, and being able to lord it over poor pathetic unmarried you, might be the only thing keeping her warm at night.

Sunny ways carry a whiff of Harper days

Thomas Walkom

When Justin Trudeau's Liberals won last year's election, many Canadians were ecstatic.

Compared to outgoing PM Stephen Harper, Trudeau seemed — to these voters at least — a breath of fresh air.

The working assumption was that things would be done differently in Ottawa. As it turned out, some things were very different.

The new Liberal government negotiated a deal with the provinces to expand the Canada Pension Plan, something the Harper Conservatives were dead-set against. It also replaced Harper's universal baby bonus with one targeted to income.

It established the inquiry into murdered and missing indigenous women that Harper refused to set up. It reduced the eligibility age for full old-age security back down to 65.

But in key areas, Harperism remains.

The country got a taste of that last week when Ottawa approved a liquefied natural gas plant on British Columbia's Pacific coast, as well as a pipeline to that plant.

It was the same decision Harper would have made. And it angered the same critics.

Environmentalists pointed to the massive increase in carbon emissions that will result from the decision. Some First Nations said it will destroy the local fish habitat.

Like Harper, the new prime minister is willing to sacrifice environmental and aboriginal concerns to get things done.

Like Harper, they have relied on the provinces to curb climate change. Unlike Harper, they are talking of setting a national carbon price. But they have given no hint as to whether this national price will reduce emissions sufficiently to allow them to meet their targets.

In fact, unless any new national carbon price is higher than those already in use by Ontario, Quebec, Alberta and B.C., it won't suffice.

On terrorism and national security, the new government is resolutely Harperesque.

The Liberals promised to roll back elements of Bill C-51, Harper's addition to anti-terror laws. But so far they have done no such thing.

In fact, as Canada's privacy commissioner has noted, under the Liberals, security services are using some of the new powers apace.

Militarily, the Trudeau government kept its promise to remove Canada's fighter planes from the war in Iraq. But it compensated by tripling the number of Canadian military advisers who are on the ground in that war.

The means may differ from those employed by Harper. But the aim is unchanged.

On it goes.

The economy? Harper preached pipelines, free trade deals and foreign investment. So does Trudeau. The two have differed, though, on which pipelines to back.

They may have disagreed on when to run deficits, but both were willing to put government finances in the red in order to boost economic growth.

None of this is to suggest that Trudeau's Liberal government is identical to that of Conservative Harper. It is not.

But there is a remarkable continuity.

A double scoop of social justice

INTERVIEW

Jerry Greenfield on the reasons Ben & Jerry's gets political

Liz Brown
Metro | Canada

Jerry Greenfield is well aware of the power of a scoop of ice cream.

After greeting me with a giant bear hug, the co-founder of Ben & Jerry's sets about scooping up free cups of his chocolate chip cookie dough flavour for a crowd of students before settling down to discuss the real reason he's in Toronto: climate change.

Greenfield was participating in a forum last week as part of the Enactus World Cup — an event that brought students and business leaders from around the globe together to talk about how entrepreneurship can fuel social change.

It was a crafty move to offer free treats to hungry conference attendees, perhaps even an attempt to sweeten up the people who may ask hard questions.

Indeed, after indulging, I feel a bit hypocritical pointing out his company's own carbon footprint — but I forge ahead, because nearly 15 per cent of the world's global greenhouse gases come from livestock (and the dairy cattle that produce his brand's ice cream). It's a point that needs to be addressed.

"It's interesting, when we did our analysis, we found that 42 per cent of our (CO2) impact is through dairy," he concedes.

But Ben & Jerry's has been leading the way with new technology in an effort to slash their greenhouse emissions by 80 per cent by 2020. This includes purchasing 100 per cent of its electricity from renewable sources for all its U.S. sites and using a machine nicknamed the Chunkinator at its factory in the Netherlands, which transforms ice cream byproducts into energy.

"We're not on track," admits Ben & Jerry's PR director Sean Greenwood, when asked how close they are to meeting that 2020 goal. "But that's the exciting part of it, there are renewable energy technologies being developed every day that are going to help us meet that goal."

Upon cursory examination, this all seems like another corporate feel-good mission, except it's coming from Greenfield — a guy who earlier this year was arrested for 'unlawful demonstration activities' at the U.S. Capitol, along with his sidekick Ben Cohen.

In April, they joined 300 other protesters as part of the Democracy Awakening movement to protect voting rights, reduce corporate influence on politics and ask for action on climate change, and workers' rights.

"There's not enough social justice in this world," says Greenfield when asked why he's been so vocal about so many issues.

For him, climate change is the greatest social issue of all because of the impact it has on the world's poorest nations, who depend more heavily on weather conditions for their livelihoods and successful agriculture.

"We strongly felt at Ben & Jerry's that if we were going to be involved in making this product that has such a heavy impact, we need to do whatever we can to minimize those impacts," he says.

Ben & Jerry's, which started and has its headquarters in Vermont, has always had an activist streak. In the 1980s they took a position on U.S. military spending, pushing the government to take money out of the Pentagon budget and use it for more 'human' needs like education and health care.

More recently, both Ben & Jerry were vocal in their support of Bernie Sanders' run for the Democratic nomination, with Ben even coming up with a special flavour — Bernie's Yearning — a 99 per cent vanilla flavour with a one per cent hard chocolate top.

"It was NOT a Ben & Jerry's flavour," clarifies Greenfield. "But it was part of the Ben's Best Line of Flavours, which contains only one flavour. This one."

When asked if the pair would ever consider making a custom flavour for Hillary Clinton or Donald Trump, Greenfield shakes his head. "Don't hold your breath."

But back on the topic of being an activist businessman: "What ice cream really helps with is that it's allowed Ben & Jerry's to talk about pretty serious, divisive issues, but to do it in a way that is lighthearted, and over sharing ice cream together."

"It opens up people's hearts to be eating ice cream. Particularly if it's free," he says, laughing.

And once he has the people sweetened up — "they'll be willing to consider social justice."

Playing cyborg an actor's dream

THE SHOW: Westworld, Season 1, Episode 4 (HBO)
THE MOMENT: Playing cyborg

Deep inside the hyper-realistic Westworld theme park, cyborg programmer Bernard (Jeffrey Wright) runs a diagnostic test on lifelike android Dolores (Evan Rachel Wood). Guests pay $40,000 per day for the privilege of raping and murdering the robots, who are then rebuilt, their memories wiped. But Dolores is beginning to remember.

"What happened to your parents?" Bernard asks.

Dolores hyper-ventilates, cries. "Reduce emotional affect," Bernard orders.

Dolores's face and voice fall. "They were killed," she says flatly. "I can make your pain go away," Bernard says.

"The pain is all I have left of them," Dolores says. "You think grief will make you smaller inside, but it doesn't. I feel spaces opening in me, like rooms I've never explored."

"Did we write that for you?" he asks.

"I adapted it from a scripted dialog about love," she replies.

Westworld is full of complex ideas, written smoothly into the characters and plots: Playing God makes one insane. Violent delights have violent ends. It's heady stuff, often horribly sad.

But man, it must be a hoot to play a cyborg.

What could be better for a thesp than toggling between programmed character and blank slate; than playing multiple death scenes, love scenes, scenes of bravery and fear? Westworld is a fever dream about how precarious civilization is. It's an actor's dream, too.

Johanna Schneller is a media connoisseur who zeroes in on pop-culture moments. She appears Monday through Thursday.

Evan Rachel Wood plays the lifelike android Dolores in Westworld. CONTRIBUTED

The secret shame of the middle class

PERSONAL FINANCE

Most people don't talk about their money stress

Writer Neal Gabler broke the don't-talk-about-money taboo this spring with an Atlantic article, The Secret Shame of Middle-Class Americans. Now he wants everyone to start talking.

"The idea of not being successful financially in America is such a stigma," says Gabler, who revealed in the article that he was among the millions of adults who didn't have savings to cover a $400 emergency. "That's the reason people don't talk about it, because they take their failure personally."

Yet financial stress is epidemic. Nearly three-quarters of U.S. adults admitted feeling stressed about money, and 22 per cent reported extreme stress in a 2015 study commissioned by the American Psychological Association, "Stress in America: Paying With Our Health".

Other studies have shown that financial stress can be lethal: Money worries have been linked to higher mortality rates among cancer patients and those with heart disease.

A study for the Australian government found prolonged financial stress was a strong predictor of subsequent obesity. Obesity is associated with higher death rates. In fact, one study published in the American Journal of Public Health found that obese adults were 20 per cent more likely to die during the 14-year study period than normal-weight adults.

Adding insult to injury, financial stress also seems to make people look older, according to a study published in Research on Aging.

Despite its pervasiveness, most people don't disclose the financial pressures they face. In a study commissioned by Umpqua Bank, 77 per cent of respondents said they didn't talk about their money stress, often because they were embarrassed or ashamed or thought no one would understand.

"Yet, of that 23 per cent of folks who did talk about it, 70 per cent of them felt better after doing so," says Eve Callahan, Umpqua's executive vice-president of corporate communications. "They felt less stressed out, they felt like they had more, a better ability to make financial decisions and live their lives in a way that would be healthy for them."

The survey prompted the bank to launch a podcast series, "Open Account with SuChin Pak," to explore personal stories about money, including Gabler's. The bank also set up a website, MadeToGrow.com, to offer people resources for starting their own conversations.

The idea that talking can help with stress isn't new. Research by James W. Pennebaker of the University of Texas at Austin and others found that talking or writing about traumatic events can alleviate distress, improve immune function and lead to better health.

The idea that talking can help with stress isn't new. Research by James W. Pennebaker of the University of Texas at Austin and others found that talking or writing about traumatic events can alleviate distress, improve immune function and lead to better health.

Gabler, for one, is glad he opened up.

"I'm an extremely private person. I never write about myself," Gabler says.

"I broke my own taboo because I thought there are other people out there who are in a similar predicament and it would help them to know that they are not alone."

Gabler wrote that despite outward appearances of success, he had juggled creditors, had his bank account levied and been down to his last $5 while waiting for a paycheck to arrive.

Even a small amount of savings can help people weather shocks. A study by the Urban Institute found that savings in the $250 to $749 (U.S.) range were enough to dramatically lower the chances a low-income family would be evicted or suffer other serious hardships after an income drop.

The researchers estimated middle-income families need at least $2,000 and higher-income families $5,000, but a starter emergency fund of $400 or $500 can cover many minor emergencies and enhance financial stability.

A splash of blue on the pink ribbon

RAISING AWARENESS

Men can be diagnosed with breast cancer, too

Will McGuirk

As Breast Cancer Awareness Month begins the race for a cure continues unabated. The pink ribboned baton of awareness is passed from person to person and across generations. Peggy Miller, founder of the Male Breast Cancer Coalition, says we need to add a splash of blue to the pink to raise awareness around male breast cancer.

Miller's 17-year-old son Brett was diagnosed six years ago and she says much more support is needed for male breast cancer survivors. She co-founded the coalition in response.

"One man reached out on our site. He says I need help ... I just had a mastectomy, and my wife won't look at me, touch me or be around me ... and I am so embarrassed to even reach out to someone," says Miller, adding she believes the man said he is from the Ottawa area but most survivors wish to remain anonymous because of the stigma.

"Breast cancer knows no gender," says Miller, "We need to get the word out, it's not just a pink world for women."

However it is an overwhelmingly pink world. According to the Canadian Cancer Society, 25,000 women will be diagnosed with breast cancer annually; 5,000 will not survive it. Among men the numbers are significantly lower, with 60 expected to die from 220 diagnosed.

Susan A. Enns, co-director of the Run for Teams Ottawa / Gatineau, and a cancer survivor herself, says incidents of breast cancer in women have remained constant but mortality rates have decreased by 43 per cent since its peak in 1986. Enns credits the annual CIBC Run for the Cure and the funds raised by the event for the progress made over the past 30 years, but she acknowledges there is more work to be done.

The thousands who will take part in this year's Breast Cancer Awareness Month activities know, too, there is a lot more work to be done. One more mother, daughter, aunt, sister lost to breast cancer is one more too many. So they participate and raise funds in the name of those they have lost to cancer and to pursue the cure and support for survivors; men alongside the women as allies. But as awareness grows about the splash of blue on the pink, men will be seen as supporters but also as survivors.

Jays' wild ride continues

MLB
Toronto clinches berth in one-game playoff with O's

Aaron Sanchez took a no-hitter into the seventh inning and Troy Tulowitzki singled to break an eighth-inning tie, helping the Toronto Blue Jays clinch the AL's top wild-card berth Sunday with a 2-1 victory over the Boston Red Sox in David Ortiz's final regular-season game.

Toronto clinched a spot in the post-season when Detroit lost to Atlanta 1-0 earlier Sunday evening. With their win in Boston, the Blue Jays earned the right to host the Baltimore Orioles in a one-game playoff on Tuesday.

The Red Sox, who lost five of their last six games, will start their AL Division Series against the Indians on Thursday in Cleveland.

Pitching with Jose Fernandez's initials on his hat in tribute to the Marlins pitcher who died last week, Sanchez held Boston hitless until Hanley Ramirez's disputed home run with two outs in the seventh. The ball sailed over the foul pole above the Green Monster; Sanchez argued it was foul, but the replay upheld the original call.

Xander Bogaerts followed with a single — the only other hit allowed by Sanchez, who lowered his ERA to 3.00 and clinched the AL title. In all, Sanchez (15-2) allowed one run, walking two, striking out six and hitting a batter.

The Blue Jays took the lead back in the eighth against Brad Ziegler (2-4) when Tulowitzki singled with runners on first and third. Toronto's other run came on Devon Travis's solo homer in the fifth.

David Price allowed one run and four hits, walking three and striking out four in five innings in his final tune-up before starting Game 2 of the ALDS for Boston.

The loss did little to spoil the celebration for Ortiz, who went hitless in four at-bats, hitting a nubber in front of the plate with one out in the ninth.

The team announced it will retire his No. 34 sometime next

RYDER CUP U.S. back on top after rout

This wasn't about being maybe the best team ever assembled. The Americans were simply a team, and they finally won back the Ryder Cup.

Phil Mickelson led the Americans behind the scenes. Patrick Reed powered them with his passion on the golf course. And it was Ryan Moore, the final captain's pick who wasn't even on the team until a week ago Sunday, who delivered the cup-clinching point in the 17-11 victory at Hazeltine.

The last time the U.S. had won the Ryder Cup.

Moore finished eagle-birdie-par for a 1-up victory over Lee Westwood, and the celebration was on.

"When put in the right environment, the U.S. team brought out some amazing golf," Mickelson said. "And we're bringing back the Ryder Cup because of it."

There was no meltdown like Medinah four years ago, when the Americans blew a 10-6 lead under captain Davis Love III.

Europe never really had a chance.

Reed outduelled and outshouted Rory McIlroy for a 1-up victory, and by then the back end of the scoreboard was filled with American red. THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

PREMIER LEAGUE Tottenham hands Pep his first loss

Tottenham ended Pep Guardiola's perfect Premier League start with Manchester City with an impressive 2-0 victory on Sunday that left the London club as the only unbeaten side.

Following last season's title-challenge collapse, the Spurs are enjoying their best-ever start to a top-flight campaign.

City trailed for the first time in the league this season in calamitous circumstances when Aleksandar Kolarov diverted the

IN BRIEF

Engine failure costs Hamilton win in Malaysia

A furious Lewis Hamilton demanded answers from his Mercedes team after an engine failure cost him victory in Sunday's Malaysian Grand Prix and severely dented his chances of winning this year's Formula One drivers' championship.

Hamilton was leading on lap 41 of 56 at the Sepang International Circuit when his engine blew, handing the race lead and ultimately victory to Red Bull's Daniel Ricciardo. THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Pats handed bagel by Bills

Buffalo took advantage of sloppy, Tom Brady-less New England to hand the Patriots their first home shutout at Gillette Stadium, winning 16-0 Sunday.

It was the first loss of the season for New England (3-1), which was playing its final game before Brady returns from his four-game "Deflategate" suspension.

Tyrod Taylor connected with LeSean McCoy for a seven-yard touchdown pass for the Bills (2-2). THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NFL Falcons' dynamic duo tame Panthers

Julio Jones GETTY IMAGES

Matt Ryan and Julio Jones brought down some team records — and the defending NFC champions.

Ryan shredded Carolina's defence, passing for a team-record 503 yards and four touchdowns, Jones had 12 receptions for a Falcons-record 300 yards, and Atlanta overwhelmed the struggling Panthers 48-33 on Sunday.

Carolina quarterback Cam Newton left the game in the fourth quarter after suffering a concussion. THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

RECIPE Chinese 5-Spice Chicken Tray Bake

For Metro Canada

This tray bake is next level deliciousness with warm and fragrant Chinese 5-Spice.

Ready in 20 minutes

Prep time: 1 hour
Cook time: 20 minutes
Serves 4

Ingredients

- 3 Tbsp olive oil, plus extra for onions
- 4 - 5 garlic cloves, pressed
- 1 Tbsp rice vinegar
- 1 Tbsp brown sugar
- 1 tsp Chinese 5-spice
- 1/2 tsp salt
- 6 large skinless, boneless chicken thighs
- 2 onions, peeled and sliced
- 1 tsp fresh chopped cilantro

Directions

1. Combine olive oil, garlic, rice vinegar, brown sugar, 5-spice and salt in a large resealable plastic bag. Add chicken thighs; seal and coat chicken with sauce. Chill at least 1 hour or overnight.

2. Preheat oven to 400. Slice and coat onion in a bit of olive oil. Spray baking sheet with non-stick cooking spray. Scatter onion slices on baking sheet.

3. Remove chicken from refrigerator and arrange on top of onion. Roast until chicken is cooked through, about 20 minutes.

4. Remove tray from oven and let cool for a few minutes. Sprinkle chicken and onion with cilantro and serve warm.
